

The FCC should deny the request of banking institution to weaken the No-Call list law. This law has eliminated so many telemarketing phone calls and has done a great service to the public. Financial institutions already send tons of direct-marketing mail to consumers as it is, and this protection of the public's privacy is a valuable tool in allowing the public to control their personal decisions.